Chief Guest Profile

“Mompreneur | International Speaker | EdEX Top 40 Under 40 | Bharat Nirmaan Awardee | Digital Marketing Expert | Women Entrepreneurship | Incubation for Women SMEs and Women-Led Startups | Supporting Back to Career for Women in Emerging Tech”

Vandhana Ramanathan co-founded WSquare – India’s first co-working and incubation centre for women – on the footing of her personal experience of joining the workforce after a 3-year break. Her keen understanding of the problems women face and the opportunities they miss when working from home led WSquare to cater to working women’s unique needs – from daycare to coaching in business finance and everything in between. Confident and self-motivated, Ramanathan shares valuable opinion on the skills a women entrepreneur must possess, and the role of women leaders in other women’s lives.

The Decision to Start Up:

I took a three year break from my full-time IT career when I had my children. And while every job that I applied for post the break was fun and taught me a lot, there were aspects of those jobs that were extremely challenging – especially for a new mother who was returning to the workforce after a break. Either the commute was too long or the work hours were not suitable or something else. I was unable to give my 100% to work and I constantly felt that I was not spending enough time with my children. I had the work-from-home option but that involves its own downsides – there are distractions at home, chores you think you should be getting to instead of working, and general lethargy – which lead to inefficiency. Working that way was quite unfulfilling for me. I felt like post the break, I was failing at having a work-life balance.

That’s when I decided that I wanted to start something of my own. A venture where I’m able to relate to the problems women face when they return to work after a break. Especially mothers who have to raise children but who also want to follow, professionally, what they are passionate about.

On Founding WSquare: My co-founder, Jinal Patel, and I initially started a digital marketing agency where we worked with women across the globe who had high-profile jobs but had taken a 3-4 year professional break for various reasons. We worked with them on contractual basis, often giving them social media projects that involved writing content, designing graphics, managing social media for different brands and analysing Facebook ads. Over a period of two years we realized that although there were a lot of women who wanted to get back to work after their break, and even wanted to work from home, the consistency was missing. There was always some guilt that came in the way of them performing their best. And working from home was definitely impairing their productivity.

This realization led to us wanting to create an ecosystem that supports women with not just infrastructure and services that suit their needs but also a community that they can fall back on for emotional support. We launched WSquare, India's first co-working space for women, in 2017 on women's day. At Wsquare women are provided facilities ranging from daycare to on-site grocery delivery and on-call beauty and medical services. We have coaching sessions, workshops and talks that cover all aspects of being a women entrepreneur, no matter how small the business model. This opens for them a network of trusted mentors and exposure to knowledge, which they may not have access to if they work from home. We also have an incubation programme for women-led startups and are now training women in the latest technology – artificial intelligence, block chain, machine learning – so that when they get back to work after their break they are in tune with what is currently happening in the industry.
